The subject, however, has been so well discussed, that it is little likely that anything new can be advanced upon it on either side. On the one hand, we may expect the ordinary run of the arguments which have become by this time familiar to everyone, in which it is assumed that Opium smoking is in all cases and of necessity of the most pernicious character; while, on the up at the Guard House, Marray Barracks, to -other hand, it will be urged that the evil effects of Opium have been very greatly exaggerated. Between these conflicting views, those who have to award the prize will find it very difficult to decide, and it is most baving been refused a passage to Yokhame. likely that they will lean towards the essayists who write upon the side which they themselves forces. desire to espouse. If, however, it is desired simply to arrive at the facts connected with the subject, this can be done with the greatest ease by simply perusing the evidence which was good order of the Colony. given before the Select Committee on the Indian Revenue in 1871. We are confident that no signs of being able to get a living honestly clearer exposition of the whole merits of the Le had seen him often in the company of case could be made, as both Sir RUTHERFORD. Such, however, is undoubtedly not the fact, as although there are some who was sent to 14 days' hard labour. ruin their constitutions by over-indulgence in Opiuin, just as there are men at home who ruin their constitutions by drink, there are thousands who use Opium with no such pernicions effects, and it would be going very far to say that the evils from Opium in China come up to those produced by gin and fusel oil at home.

The points which have, however, been urged most persistently against the Opium traffic, s that Great Britain was responsible for lintroducing the trade into China, and that but for foreign Opium being imported, the the use of the drug would discontinue. Both these statements are, however, clearly proved to be contrary to fact. As regards the first, all argument is set aside by its having been discovered, by one of the Commissioners of Customs, that allusion is made to Opium in a Chinese book which was written a hundred and thirty years ago; and the latter statement, which is founded upon the idea that Opium is not cultivated in China, is equally erroneous. It is beyond question that, long before any foreigner placed his foot on the coast of China, a steady trade in Opium had been conducted between China and India over the borders, and that the cultivation of for one hour. No direct insult, and no positive menace, did I meet with in my walk; but some of the men having rather a pitying and sorrowful expression of countenance as the European stranger passed them by; and a few of the hardier urchins "Foreign devil, foreign devil!

There you go-there I there you go I Fangui, in black hat !"

A few weeks earlier, I thought, as I passed on none of these youngeters would have dared to utter a disrespectful word in the bearing of any European. The mob of Shanghai, within a short space after the signing of the treaty guaranteeing our freedom of trading and resi ding in China, had been thoroughly taught that outbursts of the old jealousy of the foreign-er were highly reprehensible. The mandarin police, with their long sticks, had completely cowed any surly sentiment of national moroseness on the part of the rabble; and besides, the Chinese are as tractable as any people on this earth, and can be managed with case, though always on the unimplied condition, that they do not feel themselves the strongest. On that evening, I felt sure that mischief of some kind must be brewing.

At the corner of a narrow lane, where a tall fence or sied with iron spikes defended a strip of well irrigated garden-ground on one side, while on the other stood a row of tumble-down -hovels, built of rotten bamboo and mats, and thatched with flag-rushes cut in the river-bed stood three men conversing. They were just parting company when I came, within earshot, and one of them, half-mechanically, as it seemed, stretched out his hand as he said some words of farewell. Now, band-shaking is not a Chinese mode of salutation, and something singular in this val-dictory act, and in the hesitating manner in which the proffered hand was accepted, caught my attention at once. The man who had held out his band to be shaken was a tail fellow, young, to judge by his lithe figure and upright bearing, but so cariously buddled up in loose white clothes and a widebrimmed hat of the coarsest straw, that nobody could easily have guessed his nationality. H were no robe, but a loose long jacket and baggy trousers of some stout homespun fab ic, with a yellow silk sush and C inese slippers. By the nature of his attire he should have been scafaring man of some sort, but whether tawny Lascar from Madras, a Portuguese from Macuo, or some stray, deck-hand out of a Canton junk or a Malay pros, it was impossible to conjecture Shanghai contained many coast. ing sailors of every variety of complexion, from scoty black to a fair Swedish skin-tint, and of every religion from that of Mumbo Jumbo to

The seafaring man seemed vexed with himself, judging from his gestures, at having given his hand to one of his two companions. Perhaps he thought that it was an act, in such a place, of a comprehising character, or one calculated to attract attention; but at anyrate he did not offer to renew the handshaking with the second of the two men, undoubtedly Chinese, with whom he had been so earnestly conversing. They exchanged only, a word or two more, and nothing reached my car but this one speech : "Let the dollars be ready, then-Unbar the gate, and leave it to us to do the rest !"

It was not the sailor-looking man who had said this. The speaker was the taller of the two landsmen, and I noticed that he spoke very all us speak when we wish to be understood by discourse made very plain to him. He em- the undereigned in his own name. ployed, too, the pure literary language, without the corruptions to which daily experience in business had accustomed me, and his accent was correct and clear, though the voice itself was a masal and unpleasing one.

Just then a red paper-lantern, borne before some notable suburban trader who was rich enough to be escorted home by a couple of obsequious servants, threw its ruddy light upon the group, and especially on the suitor's face. Good heavens! it is Julian Lake, here, of all unlikely places, in such company, and in such a garb! In another instant, and as if shrinking from the light of the crimson lintern, Lake was gone; but the other two men, lau bing low, and muttering to one another as they came slowly on, passed me so closely that the sleeve of the tuller of the two brashed me as firm per procuration. he went by, and I had fuir view of them both. Queer-looking persons they were, decorously dressed in blue cotton and black satin, but dusty and travel-stained, while I noticed that THE interest and responsibility of Mr. JAMES they had long hair, the very wearing of which is in China a beinous political offence, and that 'ultimo, by lapse of time. can quite convey, something balf-sly, bulf- our firm. silly, wholly brutalised, such as one might |: expect to see stamped on the countenance of a vicious and feeble-minded fanatio. Once, and once only, had I seen such an expression on human faces before, and that was when some Tueping insurgente, brought into Shanghai, passed me. on their way to execution. As I walked home that night, I pondered much on that singular rencontre with Julian Lake and his wild friends. What could it all mean? (End of Part I.)

| Every afternoon, between 2 and 3, a portly-looking lady, with a kindly expression of countenance, with large, blue eyes and hair slightly tinged with gray, may be seen to leave the executive mansion at Versailles, leading a little girl by the hand, and devoting her attention immediately to a number of poor people who seemed to have waited for her, and among them she and her pretty little companion then distribute alms, addressing a few benevolent words to each of the recipients of their charities. When the two, whom the most casual beholder will at once recognise to be mother and daughter, appear, the two sentings re- | that she has an excellent heart, that she is nobly ambitious, a generous foe, endowed with considerable literary talents, keensighted in politics, and a fervent Christian.
